DIZZY IDEA

MISS DESDEMONA BATES (Dizzy, to her friends) sat in the back booth and swirled the coke in her glass as she brooded over the intolerable situation. Around her surged the noise of the Jive Joint, the gay chatter of her schoolmates, the clatter of glassware, the sharp reprimand of Mr. Hodges, the proprietor, when some teen-ager got too noisy. It was all familiar and comfortable, but to Dizzy there was no comfort left in life.

"It isn't fair," she muttered angrily.

"What isn't fair, Sugar-Puss?" Slim Brady demanded, leaning over the back of her booth. "Something must be darn sour to have a cute creature like you back here in the mourner's booth, mumbling to herself and glaring at an innocent coke glass. Give, honey."

"Aw," Dizzy said fiercely, "it's that—that impossible snooty Gwendolyn Chambers. I wish she'd get carbuncles, or something."

"Me, too," Slim said, grinning. "What's she up to, now?"

Dizzy waved a hand toward a chattering group of girls up at the front of the Jive Joint. "Look at her. Here my very best girl friend, Pat, is running for school president and everybody knows she's a cinch to be elected. And what happens? Gwendolyn Chambers moves to town with her bleached hair and her sickly-sweet way and starts running against her. Ugh!"

"Don't look now," Slim said, "but they say this is a free country, honey. Practically anybody can run for president, and the suckers . . . er . . . students decide by vote which they want. It's a system that has its advantages."

Dizzy stamped her foot angrily. "Don't be so dense, dope. You know what I mean. Pat's running on an honest platform. But there is that Gwendolyn buying votes by treating all the ickies and the wooden-heads in school to free sodas. Just because her Dad has oodles of money, she figures she can buy anything. It's simply disgusting, that's what it is."

"Hmmm," Slim said thoughtfully. "I see your point, honey. She is playing fairy godmother to an awful flock of creeps up there. But I guess that's politics. There's nothing you can do."

"Oh, no! Just you wait and see, Slim Brady.

I'll figure out something and when I do, it'll hister that bleached blonde to smithereens."

"Wish you luck," Slim shrugged. "Her old man's the same way, I guess. I see by the paper he's throwing a big wing-ding for the society swells of the town tonight. He probably figures he'll get in good with the blue-bloods and take over the town like Gwendolyn figures to take over the school."

"What?" Dizzy grabbed Slim's sleeve. "Get me a copy of that paper—quick. I've got an idea how we can queer both deals with one shot. My Dad says if Gwendolyn's father gets a foot in around here, he'll grab control of business and squeeze all the nice folks out so he can jack up prices on everything. They say that's why he picked our town."

In a moment she and Slim were bent over the afternoon paper, reading the details of the anticipated ball at the Chambers home that night. Dizzy raised her head, narrow-eyed. Up at the front of the shop, Gwendolyn was beaming at her giggling guests as she bade them farewell. "I'll leave plenty of money with the boy," she was telling them loudly. "You girls order all the cokes and sodas you want. Just remember, your friend, Gwendolyn Chambers, when you vote for school president tomorrow."

"Hold the fort," Dizzy said hastily. She darted from the booth and caught up with Gwendolyn outside the door hut in plain sight of the girls within.

"What do you want?" Gwendolyn demanded nastily when Dizzy hailed her. "I'm in a hurry to get my hair done and pick out some new clothes for Father's party tonight. Make it snappy, child."

"Sure I'll make it snappy," Dizzy said, poisonously sweet. "I just wanted to tell you something hut now I've forgotten what it was. Run along and get your hair bleached, dearie, and I do hope you have a simply sticky time tonight. Tata!"

She went back inside, leaving the mystified Gwendolyn to stare after her with sharp suspicion. Dizzy smiled brightly at the huddle of girls Gwendolyn had left. They were certainly, she thought, the prize creeps in school. Every one of them was a girl nobody cared for.

There was Mamie Hagger who giggled constantly over nothing and couldn't speak two sensible words in an evening. There was fat Sophie who hogged all the rich food in sight. There was Windy who bragged about herself noisily and constantly, and Scuffy, who never combed her hair and always looked like a mess. Altogether there were eight girls who were just about the most unpleasant company anyone could find.

Dizzy smiled at them sweetly. "Girls, guess what. You've all read about the big swell party at Gwendolyn's tonight. Well, she just asked me to invite all you girls to come. Be there promptly at eight and make yourselves right at home. Don't be shy because of all the society folks. Gwendolyn just loves to be democratic."

Amid a chorus of squeals and giggles and gasps of delight, she took Slim's limp arm and sailed out of the Jive Joint. Slim could only gape at Dizzy, open-mouthed and dazed. When he found his voice, he gasped, "Are you completely nuts, honey? Why should you help that bleached babe buy votes?"

"It's just my terribly generous nature," Dizzy told him, suppressing a titter. "Pick me up at quarter to eight tonight and we'll go watch the festivities. I have a feeling the Chambers ball tonight is going to make history."

A few minutes before eight that night Dizzy and Slim crouched side by side in the garden, watching through the french windows as the society crowd swarmed into the Chambers mansion. A haughty butler in uniform bellowed the names of each arrival and there was a constant stir of excitement as the cream of local society moved in. At one end of the big room an orchestra tuned up for dancing and caterers moved on noiseless feet, setting up tables of food and drinks for the guests.

Through it all Gwendolyn and her father moved like a king and queen, greeting the guests, beaming with hearty welcome. It was simply nauseating, Dizzy thought, the way those two fawned over the society crowd as if they really amounted to something. But when the butler suddenly appeared in the doorway in a state of intense agitation, Dizzy grabbed Slim's arm. "Now it comes," she whispered, "Watch the fireworks now."

"Announcing," shouted the butler, and paused to swallow hard, "the Misses Mamie Hagger, Sophie Trugg, Windy Blunt . . ."

That was as far as he got. At that moment the whole squealing, shrieking crowd of girls erupted through the door behind the butler, almost knocking him down in their rush. They gaped around at the fancy furnishings and then, spying the pale and incredulous Gwendolyn, they swarmed down on her with shrieks and shouts.

"Oh, Gwendolyn darling, it was simply wonderful of you to invite us to your simply scrumptious party. Just look at the mob of stuffed shirts. We'll liven things up for you, Gwendolyn."

Sophie made a bee-line for the table and began to stuff herself. Windy cornered some helpless dowager and began to tell about her latest triumphs. Mamie giggled and tittered. The orchestra burst into tune in an effort to cover the confusion and Horsey Jones grabbed the president of the Bankers Club and dragged him onto the floor for a jitterbug dance.

Everything was wild confusion. Above it came the roaring voice of Mr. Chambers bawling, "Gwendolyn, who are these—these insufferable creatures?"

And Gwendolyn's scream answered, "The stupidest, most impossible girls in school, Father. Get them out of here before they ruin everything."

"Jenkins!" bawled Mr. Chambers at the frantic butler. "Do something. Get these—these females out of here if you have to throw them out."

"Come on," Dizzy hissed, above bursts of muffled laughter. "Let's get out of here before somebody spots us."

They were running down the street when they heard doors slam loudly. They looked back. The sedate president of the Bankers Club, and half a dozen friends and their wives, were stalking away from the Chambers house in outraged dignity. The big ball, it seemed, was breaking up almost before it had begun.

"I have to hand it to you," Slim said. "You really did that up brown, Dizzy. If those gals vote for Gwendolyn tomorrow, it'll be a miracle."

"It's just as well," Dizzy said primly. "I have a feeling the Chambers won't be in our town very long and we wouldn't want a school president who moved away in the middle of the year."
